The chronicle attributed to John Malalas, retreating the world history from the Creation to the reign of Justinian (527–565 AD) refers to inscriptions 25 times, citing 21 of them textually (Boularot 2006: 98). Previous investigations of Malalas’ use of inscriptions by Dowey (1986, 1990) and Boularot (2006: 98), however, are rather limited in their focus. In fact, most inscriptions that Malalas reports upon or refers to in his chronicle were not related to Justinian’s or his empire. For instance, the emperor’s own name or titles are not generally relevant for Malalas, who is more concerned with events or their outcomes. Nevertheless, inscriptions are occasionally referred to in his text, and these are usually used as sources of information (Boularot 2006: 105).

The second text (XIII 3 p. 244 = J. Th. 114) of the series of monumental inscriptions commemorating the Roman victories in the Jewish War under Vespasian and Titus, masterly analysed in Alföldy 1995 (esp. 217-222).

The chronicle attributed to John Malalas, retreating the world history from the Creation to the reign of Justinian (527–565 AD) refers to inscriptions 25 times, citing 21 of them textually (Boularot 2006: 98). Previous investigations of Malalas’ use of inscriptions by Dowey (1986, 1990) and Boularot (2006: 98), however, are rather limited in their focus. In fact, most inscriptions that Malalas reports upon or refers to in his chronicle were not related to Justinian’s or his empire. For instance, the emperor’s own name or titles are not generally relevant for Malalas, who is more concerned with events or their outcomes. Nevertheless, inscriptions are occasionally referred to in his text, and these are usually used as sources of information (Boularot 2006: 105).

The second text (XIII 3 p. 244 = J. Th. 114) of the series of monumental inscriptions commemorating the Roman victories in the Jewish War under Vespasian and Titus, masterly analysed in Alföldy 1995 (esp. 217-222).

John Malalas and His Use of Inscriptions

Oliver Gengler

The second text (XIII 3 p. 244 = J. Th. 114) of the series of monumental inscriptions commemorating the Roman victories in the Jewish War under Vespasian and Titus, masterly analysed in Alföldy 1995 (esp. 217-222).

The chronicle attributed to John Malalas, retreating the world history from the Creation to the reign of Justinian (527–565 AD) refers to inscriptions 25 times, citing 21 of them textually (Boularot 2006: 98). Previous investigations of Malalas’ use of inscriptions by Dowey (1986, 1990) and Boularot (2006: 98), however, are rather limited in their focus. In fact, most inscriptions that Malalas reports upon or refers to in his chronicle were not related to Justinian’s or his empire. For instance, the emperor’s own name or titles are not generally relevant for Malalas, who is more concerned with events or their outcomes. Nevertheless, inscriptions are occasionally referred to in his text, and these are usually used as sources of information (Boularot 2006: 105).

The second text (XIII 3 p. 244 = J. Th. 114) of the series of monumental inscriptions commemorating the Roman victories in the Jewish War under Vespasian and Titus, masterly analysed in Alföldy 1995 (esp. 217-222).

The chronicle attributed to John Malalas, retreating the world history from the Creation to the reign of Justinian (527–565 AD) refers to inscriptions 25 times, citing 21 of them textually (Boularot 2006: 98). Previous investigations of Malalas’ use of inscriptions by Dowey (1986, 1990) and Boularot (2006: 98), however, are rather limited in their focus. In fact, most inscriptions that Malalas reports upon or refers to in his chronicle were not related to Justinian’s or his empire. For instance, the emperor’s own name or titles are not generally relevant for Malalas, who is more concerned with events or their outcomes. Nevertheless, inscriptions are occasionally referred to in his text, and these are usually used as sources of information (Boularot 2006: 105).

The second text (XIII 3 p. 244 = J. Th. 114) of the series of monumental inscriptions commemorating the Roman victories in the Jewish War under Vespasian and Titus, masterly analysed in Alföldy 1995 (esp. 217-222).

The chronicle attributed to John Malalas, retreating the world history from the Creation to the reign of Justinian (527–565 AD) refers to inscriptions 25 times, citing 21 of them textually (Boularot 2006: 98). Previous investigations of Malalas’ use of inscriptions by Dowey (1986, 1990) and Boularot (2006: 98), however, are rather limited in their focus. In fact, most inscriptions that Malalas reports upon or refers to in his chronicle were not related to Justinian’s or his empire. For instance, the emperor’s own name or titles are not generally relevant for Malalas, who is more concerned with events or their outcomes. Nevertheless, inscriptions are occasionally referred to in his text, and these are usually used as sources of information (Boularot 2006: 105).